The Malay wedding ceremony is a beautiful and elaborate affair, steeped in centuries of tradition. The customs and beliefs that surround the ceremony are deeply rooted in Malay culture, and they reflect the importance of marriage in Malay society.

The wedding ceremony is typically divided into three main stages: the engagement, the akad nikah (solemnisation), and the reception. The engagement is a formal agreement between the two families, and it is usually followed by a period of courtship.

The akad nikah is the most important part of the wedding ceremony. It is a religious ceremony that is performed by a kadi (Muslim judge). The kadi will ask the bride and groom a series of questions, and they will then pronounce them to be husband and wife.

The reception is a celebration of the marriage. It is usually held at the bride's or groom's home, and it is attended by family and friends. The reception typically includes a feast, music, and dancing.

Customs and Beliefs

The Malay wedding ceremony is steeped in customs and beliefs. These customs and beliefs reflect the importance of marriage in Malay culture, and they help to ensure that the marriage is a happy and successful one.

One of the most important customs is the exchange of gifts. The bride and groom will exchange gifts, such as jewellery, clothing, and money. These gifts are a symbol of their love and commitment to each other.

Another important custom is the recitation of the doa selamat. The doa selamat is a prayer that is recited by the kadi. The prayer asks for Allah's blessing on the marriage, and it is believed to help ensure that the marriage is a happy and successful one.
